"You'd better go to eleep."

I could not get another word out of him to save me, and as for going to sleep my-welf, it was entirely out of the question. It was very plain to me that Dewison had got some ideas that were not altogether so.

"O, Dick, I am so glad you've come; I've got these horses to hold and I can't shake hands with you, but—"

She evidently expected me to kiss her, and I did, and bungled as I always do. To kiss a girl properly when she is quiet, is bad enough, but I defy the coolest fellow alive to do it properly when a pair of horses are backing and pulling her about. How beautiful she was; she wore an Astrachan cloak, and hat, with a red feather in it, tipped janntily down nearly to the bridge of her nose; her checks were of delicate purple usual when the thermometer is at zero, and dimpled with the rarest essence of fun, and it was magnificent to see her saw the reins like an old jockey.

It was very short, and rain thus:

Brisawcen, Dec. 20, 186My Dran Dren: Wou't you come down directly momenter is at zero, and dimpled with the rarest essence of fun, and it was magnificent to see her saw the reins like an old lockey.

She-greeted Dewison genially, and told him to take care of the robe in the back seat, and not follose it on any account. Dewison looked at me knowingly, and sat carefully on the robe as he was directed.

arrefully on the robe as he was directed.

I always counted those few moments of our rides as one of the bright spots in my individual whirligig. I was entranced at her beauty, and savagely reproached myself that I had got her to fancy such a fellow as myself, and trembled to think she might find me out as an empty head, and as a man very far from lovable. She chatted about this, that and the other in the sweetest way imaginable. Among other things she said that Dewison had been invaluable to them in decorating and contriving. Now Dewison had nover told me of this. She said he had been down there planning and working for nearly a week.
I looked around to ask Dewison for some explanation, when I found that Dewison and the valuable robe had disappeared. We instantly concluded that he had dropped out noiselessly into the snow, preferring to reach the house before us, for some into reach the house before us, for some in-explicable purpose of his own. The rest of the ride was delightfully long and sweet, and I giadly take advantage of a story-teller's jump, and land directly at the door of Briarwood, where the Obstacle was shouting a hearty hypocritical wel-come, and poor, frosty Dewison was stamp-ng his feet on the flags. That night, just as we had got our can dles for bed, a servant slipped a note into my hand. The handwriting was that of the Obstacle. I tremblingly thrust it into my pocket, and Dewison and I ascended the stairs to my room, where I unfolded the letter and read as follows:

the letter and read as follows:

My Dran Mr. Persman: I feel obliged to write a line to remind you that notwithstanding I welcome you as cordially to spend the holiday with us as I should any one, I, of course, receive you in so other light fins that of a mere friend or mine and my daughter's. I was rather inprendent and perhaps unkind to sak you here, but I determined that you would feel in honor bound to keep our agreement of a year ayo, and not permit yourself to renew your attentions to Miss Julia without my consent. I wish you to feel toward me as though this note was never written, and I assure you that I am yours, truly.

"The ass!" "The ass!"

"The goat!"

Bitter and prolonged were Dewison's anathemas. The dear fellow had evidently thrown blinself heart and soul into the affair, and took my rebull in good earnest, and made ten times the noise about it that I did.

I did,

I begged him to be quiet; no, he wouldn't

"All right my boy," cried he, heartily seizing me by the hand; "it's all arranged; I've heard from Julia what Julia said, and how sweetly the all-important proposal was met. Now don't interrupt. I am excited again, and mind you treat her well, for I would not have the responsibility of two and perhaps more Penninam's on my hands if I imagined you would be quarrelsome with her. Listen; an hour hence your dress suit will be here. I got it from a friend, but it will have to do. At seven exactly you will go down the back stairway and out through the wash room till you come to a wood shed. You will anhap the door and lock it after you; then you come to a wood shed. You will unhasp the door and lock it after you; then go across the yard, and is the shelter of a pile of ashes you will find Julia well wrapped up. You will go to the carriagehouse, where you will find a sleigh with a couple of horses; these you will have driven out carefully by the man who will be there, and then you will drive through the fields to the little stone church just out of the village; all the bars are taken down and I have given the driver full directions and I have given the driver full directions and a couple of dollars which I will charge in account. You will find me at the church, and I will have an appropriate ring ready for you. Do you understand "

"Bother!"
Well I remember my perplexity and annoyance as the time came on, and when it did come my trembling knees, as I crept like a thief down the uncarpeted, narrow, steep stairs. I did not meet a single person, which struck me as being very strange, and there was a candle burning in the wash-room, which proved that Dewigan must have corrunted nearly the whole the wash-room, which proved that Dewi-son must have corrupted nearly the whole household. I followed the directions closely, and on reaching the air, which was frosty and cold, I turned and looked at the house, which was lighted from top to bot-tom, but as still and quiet as if all the ten-ants were dead; and I knew that the house must be talk as I had been bewing the tom, but as still and quiet as if all the tenants were dead; and I knew that the house

I had no time to think, but rushed across the yard, and I found Julia as readily as I had found the wash-room door.

When we had found our sleigh and turned our backs upon the house, Julia looked up at me with her face covered with tears.

"Oh, Dick! you won't think I'm wicked to do this, will you, when you find out? I'm afraid you'll think I'm a hypocrite."

An idea suddenly struck me.

The horses tramped and plunged through the drifts and staggered this way and that, and it took us an hour to reach the little church, which was as lightless and dismal as a tomb, notwithstanding it was Christmas eve, when all things religious should be open and free to all. Just as we came to it I saw some men standing about, who ran away as we drew near. The Radical Banner State.

The Radical press now call this "the hanner Republican State of the South." If this is indeed the flagship of the party, then it follows that the rest of the fleet then it follows that the rest of the fleet must be rotten old hulks, entirely unfit for sea and unworthy to navigate American waters. The flag which flies at the mast-head here may be called Republican, but it really is the pirate's cosign, and the raw head and bloody bones are plainly visible. The craft is in such condition that no hon-est seaman would ship aboard, especially with any acres, whose sever face looks not their looks. And the ship goes to sea with papers no cleaner than her decks, for she has been selzed by fraud and force, and has no clearance which would be re-spected by an honest vessel, or in anyhon est port.

Dropping the trope and coming to facts:
The Sea Islands, extending from Charleston to Savannah, were formerly the garden spots of the South. There wealthy plant ers lived in elegance and refinement. Cot-ton of the longest staple and finest texture was raised. The large and handsome man sions of the planters and the numerous villages of neatly whitewashed cottages occupied by the laborers beautified the landscape, and travelers delighted to tarry amid such scenes of tropical loveliness as many of these localities presented. Free-dom might have dawned even upon these islands benignasity, and added a fresh charm to its surroundings, if its teachers had instilled into the emancipated the benter, and which no man who failed to utter could remain in the land and live. Hence the garden has become a wilderness, and savages, ignorant, ruthless, and worthless, render it unsafe and untenable or equatorial Africa. It is only valuable to the party in power as a reservoir of voters, ready to stuff biennially the boxes with all the tickets sent them. This they can always do with impunity—as they did not be 17th, of October had for more many on the 17th of October last—for no man could or would venture to invade their precincts, either to scrutinize their actions or to give an opposing vote.

The horses tramped and plunged through the drifts and staggered this way at the drifts and staggered this way at the context of the half to see if I could catch, by the stones, an idea of which way the context was going. The first sound I heard was the Obstacle laughing boisterously. Fury thought I, he's no doubt laughing at the proposition and turning to ridicule the holicist passion man can have. His about inable noise came distinctly through the study door and up the stairs. I waited of sould be and then to hear it rise like the pieces of soulles and then to hear it rise like the pieces of coats, I rested hastily, and a moment after Dewison burst into the room nearly out of his head with rage.
